

What is the Staley Settlement Agreement?

FAST FACTS

- Over 4,128 adults with developmental disabilities are currently receiving services and supports through support brokerages.
- Over 1,200 Medicaid eligible adults with developmental disabilities are waiting to receive services through community-based support brokerages by June 2009.

The Staley Agreement settled a Federal class action lawsuit filed in 2000 by Medicaid-eligible adults with developmental disabilities who had spent years on long wait lists for services.

What does the Staley Agreement do?

- Entitles all eligible adults with developmental disabilities to a limited amount of service by 2009.
- Provides residential services to 300 Medicaid-eligible adults with developmental disabilities by 2009.

What does a Community-Based Support Brokerage do?

- Under the service design of the Staley Agreement, community-based support brokerages provide planning support and help adults with developmental disabilities link with community resources and locate and purchase needed services, such as job development or assistance for personal care needs.

Does the Staley Agreement meet all the needs of individuals with developmental disabilities and their families?

- No. The Staley agreement provides limited funding to provide a minimum amount of in-home support or community-based activity for an individual with developmental disabilities.
- The average amount of money available is about $800/month per individual. The Staley Agreement does not meet all of the needs of some individuals and their families.

Data: August 2006. Source: Oregon Seniors and People with Disabilities. 1/07 v1